POLITICAL SCIENCE

Overview of the Political Science program:

Political science is not only for those seeking a career in public service or those committing to focus on law school, but this degree is highly sought after from employers in the private and public sector. Students will learn to have exceptional analytical skills with a thorough understanding of social science.

Our skill-oriented program at Montana State University Billings, prepares students for citizenship roles in community and national affairs. We provide a coherent knowledge of politics, government, and public affairs while securing a broad liberal arts and sciences education with resume worthy internship prospects and personal faculty engagement.

Upon graduation, graduates will be able to utilize qualitative and quantitative methods used in the social sciences to answer questions and to investigate social and political problems. Students will develop critical thinking skills which enables them to understand and evaluate rival theories, interpretations, and arguments.

What makes your program unique?

An annual tradition for the PSCI 342 Media, Public Opinion, Polling course is to conduct a statewide telephone survey. These questions range from which candidates the respondents would vote for to the urgency of current issues.

What students like most about the Political Science program:

What students like most about the Political Science program is the flexibility of the program and the focus on skill development.
